

gulped, and there went his vote in the next election. "How did you—I mean, who—"

"Oh, that!" Congressman Britt laughed. "Buck Smith telephoned me. He's pitching today, you know. Fine boy—comes from our district, too. Well, well! Miss Appleby, I understand you're going to join the Government service. Just let me know if I can be of any help."

Mr. Appleby gulped again, and there went his determination to take Ann home with him. He leaned back and lighted the cigar. It tasted good. He looked around and saw the stadium filling with some twenty thousand people. Twenty thousand Americans, he thought suddenly, and closed his eyes for a minute, remembering. Why, this town was made up of people from all over, like Syl Britt, here; like Buck Smith; like his daughter Ann. It was America. He remembered how the Capitol dome looked at dawn, and felt a fierce, warm pride.

"THERE HE IS!" Ann exclaimed, nudging him, and Mr. Appleby sat up to see a towering young man striding to the pitcher's mound, and a happy light in his daughter's eyes. Then his Congressman was asking him about business in Prairie Vista, and chatting with him as if they had been pals for years. The next thing he heard was a good, solid smack.

"Ba-all one!"

Mr. Horace Appleby threw back his head and let out a joyous roar. He hadn't seen the pitch, but—"Kill the umpire!" he yelled.

This was another one of his constitutional rights.
